New children's book:
A Way with Words

Have you ever found yourself with a lot to say, but not the words to say it?

There are many beautiful and understated ways to communicate, and those myriad of ways are the theme behind new and absolutely breathtaking children's book A Way with Words, from debut author Stacy Burch, and debut illustrator Lucy McLoughlin.

A Way with Words is a lyrical story about little Sam, who chooses to communicate in nonverbal ways.

Sam collects her thoughts, saving them and turning them into dance, art, and music.

And while the book is conceptually brilliant, as well as bright, colorful and fun, it also conveys an important message.

According to Burch, the book shows others that:

"There are many different ways people can communicate, and they are all valid."

Open communication is crucial to solving problems, making progress, and finding peace.

If children take the time to listen, they can show and receive kindness when it's most needed."

As an English teacher and a mom of 3, Stacy has been privy to many forms of communication, and wants children, regardless of their communicative ability, to feel celebrated, seen and heard.

The book is published by sustainable Australian publisher Ethicoool Books, and includes Ethicoool's signature 'Action Page' which is designed to get little ones thinking about the broader issues highlighted in the book.
